Very sorry to hear. I have banged my head against the perpetual infighting and bullshit for 5 years on a scale I think many can't even begin to understand. This is why my motto has become a "self-generating" activism where people and groups learn about the train of thought and then follow a course of reasoning to make it happen, without a need to constantly reference some "global group" or the like. Some chapters have and continue to be a great success. Others not.

To me: TzM is a worldview for change- not an institution or chapter. As I stated in my prior broadcast, as much as everyone is an armchair expert on such a platform, it takes many many years to get a working order right in this medium... part of which is largely undiscovered.

Frankly, TzM is biggest, most annoying pain in the ass I have ever experienced - but it is also the most profound, necessary and to be sought after "institution" i can imagine. Rather than make a declaration about "joining" or "leaving", why don't we simply adjust to our comfort level and drop such declarations.

I spent a lot of time trying to organize - only to called a "leader" - so I backed off for 2 years- and things only got worse. I am stepping up now, in all my imperfection, to get shit done as best I can, to set the stage for a new level. Then I will back away again, to see if things take hold.

TzM can be really simple. really simple. and I think many simply turn it into something it is not, sadly and then get disillusioned by standards that are simply not in the cards in this circumstance.

And believe it or not - compared to other .orgs for change in this context, TzM is still WAY above. I'm sorry if people are not satisfied by the "organization". I see great merit in removing, if you will, the "global" organization for the most part where this work becomes autonomous.

Ok David. I will announce those things. Is there anyone I can point them to to address those issues or a particular email address for them to 'go to' so to speak?

Thanks,
